

It's Almost National Cooler Day

We are all guilty. We buy the kids some really cool gift and they always end up playing with the box. We know it, but we keep doing it. Isn't that the definition of stupidity—doing the same thing over and over & expecting a different result? Oh well, I digress.

Anyway, Steve & I went to Brevard last weekend and wanted to take some good old Lexington strawberries to Cody. He won't eat the ones up there—too watery. To do that, Steve packed his smallest cooler. It has a neat handle for pulling and fits in a small spot in the car.

Well, because the cooler has wheels, it suddenly became a very cool toy. Cody pushed it and pulled it and even got down on the floor and spun the wheels without it moving. He was entertained. Then Papa Steve had an idea.

You should also know, Steve has a shirt that reads: "Papa Steve. The man, the myth, the bad influence." Well this is one of those times.

Papa Steve sized up the situation and figured that the cooler was the perfect size for Cody, so he opened the lid, stood Cody up inside (facing the back so the lid became his "steering wheel") and began walking around the house. Now, their home isn't large, but the main room is open and has a little wiggle room. Around the island, into the den, past the fireplace, around the playpen, around the island...you get the picture. Those were two happy boys.

In honor of National Cooler Day, Steve & Cody created an exciting, new redneck event—Cooler Racing! (picture on back)

The other weird trick Papa Steve has taught Cody is to beat on his chest and do the Tarzan yell. He hasn't quite gotten the yell down yet, but now every time he sees Steve, Cody pats his chest with at least one hand. It always adds to the fun of our FaceTime calls.
