Interesting Combinations

This week has some things that, on their own, are fairly normal, but when paired with something else we're "celebrating" that day, it seems an odd combination. For example:

The 13th is Kids Take Over the Kitchen Day and International Chocolate Day. Now, does that mean the kids can only use chocolate in their recipes? It's also National Peanut Day. Same question. It's 9x13 Day as well, so maybe whatever the kids cook must be made in a 9x13 pan. No matter, it's also Positive Thinking Day, so we'll just think positive that everything will work out. Or we're positive that at the end of the day the kitchen will be a disaster area and everyone will be hungry.

The 14th is National Parents Day Off & National Eat a Hoagie Day. Since parents have the day off, I assume that means they don't have to cook. Are we only allowed to purchase hoagies for dinner since it's hoagie day? It's also Cream-Filled Donut Day, so maybe that's "what's for dinner".

The 16th is National Tattoo Story Day, but it's also Big Whopper Liar Day, so I'm not really sure how truthful the tattoo stories will be.

Not odd to you? Ok, it's just me. Not unusual if you know me.

The 17th is the strangest since it's Wife Appreciation Day & Professional House Cleaners Day. I am hoping they don't think those two are the same person.

A body like this doesn't happen overnight. It takes menopause, some neglect & extra slices of pizza.

This too shall pass. It might pass like a kidney stone, but it will pass.
