National Princess Day is Upon Us!

I don't remember little girls being so obsessed with princesses when I was a little girl. Of course, we weren't always watching Disney movies at home or on TV for that matter. I do remember us watching Cinderella every year on TV. Not the cartoon version, the live action musical with the beautiful Rodgers & Hammerstein musical score.

Our granddaughter is obsessed with princesses. Which one varies weekly. Currently her favorite princess is Belle from Beauty & the Beast. When I asked what she was wearing for Halloween, she informed me she was going to be "yellow Belle and Mommy is going to be blue Belle". Hmm...I thought the blue princess was Cinderella. Nope, to her "blue Belle" was the version of Belle dancing in the streets at the beginning of the movie. To me it was Cinderella or the ice cream.

Blue Belle & Yellow Belle—peasant to princess.

I'm at the age
where I gave up
my dream of ever being a Disney princess.

Evil queen is now
within my grasp.

HOW SOUTHERN PEOPLE HANDLE SNOW.

- We treat a drop in temperature like a major event.
- It's the only time of the year when we can wear our sweaters.
- It's so rare it's like an alien invasion. Every body's looking at it & nobody knows what to do with it.
- Snow clothes down here is really just everything you own layered.
- One flake falls and the whole town's lined up at the Piggly Wiggly acting like it's the end times.
- As soon as the temperature drops, boom, school's cancelled for a week.
- We might not know how to drive in it, but we sure know how to panic about it.
- It's so rare, even the snowmen look confused about why they're here.
- Half an inch of snow and suddenly every Southern dad starts reminding us, "This ain't nothing compared to that snow back in '93."
